Acknowledgments:

I owe a great debt of thanks to many people: those who helped shape this book, but also those who helped shape its author.

Thank you, Jimmie Reeves, for telling me, way back when, that I should become a scholar. Thank you, Robert McChesney, for saying (when I was a novice doctoral student) that my research would be a valuable contribution to both communication and education. I will always have deep admiration for your work. Thank you, Richard Campbell, for inviting me to annually update and revise your masterful textbook, Media and Culture, easily the best critical survey of mass communication out there, and an important testament to the need for democratic media.

Thank you Cynthia Lewis, my pillar of strength, for encouraging my ideas from the very beginning; your knowledge and advice significantly moved this research forward. Thank you, Jim Marshall, for asking the big picture questions and helping me understand the relevance of this work to a broader public—your excitement and support will be always valued. Thank you, Judy Polumbaum, for offering me grounded wisdom and many insights into internet use from a cultural studies and journalistic perspective. Thank you, John Durham Peters, for your quiet precision, and for anchoring the theoretical and historical areas of this work. Thank you, Carolyn Colvin, for being the kindest devil’s advocate imaginable, always asking me to consider the other side. And thank you, David O’Shields, for reading final versions of this manuscript not once, but twice. I am indebted to your thoughtful suggestions and unwavering enthusiasm for this topic.

Thank you, University of Iowa and Spencer Foundation, for the funding that made the research behind this book possible. Thank you, teachers, media specialists, principals, and students, who agreed to participate in this project. Thank you, Catherine Chandler and Carole Saltz, my editors at Teachers College Press who have deftly brought this book to publication.

Thank you, Julius Gy. Fabos and Edith Fabos (my wonderful parents), for helping me think against the common grain, for broadening my horizons in so many areas, and for putting travel above material things.

Thank you, Dan Webb, for the porch swing—one of the nicest gifts I’ve ever received. Thank you, Larry Althof, for your faith that I would get this book done. Thank you, all you wonderful babysitters, for being there and supplying your creative energy to our household.

Thank you, Olivia and Sabine, my two incredible daughters, who were born over the course of researching and writing this book. You are my biggest joys, and will always be associated with this work.

And most importantly, thank you, Christopher Martin, my mentor, colleague, best friend, and husband. Thank you for being so darn smart...for making this book ring true, for providing constant energy and focus, for catching a fair number of misplaced modifiers, and for engaging me, constantly, in engrossing conversations about the media, education, and democracy. This book is because of you.
